Dear Court Theatre Family,

Pearl Cleage's Blues for an Alabama Sky introduces audiences to characters who live during the Harlem Renaissance: an era of African American artistry and culture bracketed by the end of World War I and the Great Depression. During this period, Harlem was a magnet that attracted black writers, artists, musicians, and scholars who created a social and artistic explosion that we still feel today.

Blues for an Alabama Sky captures the hopefulness of this period, when inspiration and discovery abound. It also captures a moment of extraordinary change for the African American community, how it was perceived, and its emerging leaders. The characters in the play discuss Langston Hughes’ adventures, follow the triumphs of Josephine Baker, attend services where Adam Clayton Powell preached, and support the efforts of Margaret Sanger to bring family planning to the community.

Our decision to produce this play was propelled by Resident Artist Ron OJ Parson’s vision for bringing it to life on our stage. As we grew to know this play, it inspired us to build a community-wide investigation and exploration of this historic era: a Harlem Renaissance Celebration. Our instinct is to always search for works that might provide a broader platform for engagement with the University, neighboring schools, and our Hyde Park community.

The University of Chicago’s Center for the Study of Race, Politics, and Culture (CSRPC) has been extremely supportive of our previous productions of Invisible Man and Native Son. CSRPC faculty members Michael Dawson and Ken Warren embraced the idea of a Harlem Renaissance Celebration, and both are teaching classes this winter quarter focused on the period. We are grateful to have this kind of faculty support on campus. In addition, the Ancona School in Kenwood has incorporated the work of the period into their literature, history, and political science courses. Seventh and eighth grade students attended both the first rehearsal and a technical rehearsal of Blues for an Alabama Sky, and will see a full performance. We are proud of this model of intermingling artistic practice with academic study at all levels.

Audiences may also experience the depth of the Harlem Renaissance’s influences at other unique events throughout January and February. Musicians of the period—Duke Ellington, Fats Waller, and Jelly Roll Morton, to name but a few—inspired concerts at The Promontory and the Logan Center. Visual arts from the period will be on display at the Beverly Arts Center, films will be screened at the DuSable Museum of African American History, and Young Chicago Authors will open various events by performing poetry from the period alongside original works.

We believe that being a Center for Classic Theatre is not only about producing plays, but also about creating events that have the power to inspire and energize happenings both on campus and in the community.

We hope you will join us in this celebration.

In Blues for an Alabama Sky, you’re not writing about the Harlem Renaissance alone. You also focus on the Great Depression. How do you find that this time period intersects with the Great Depression, and why was that an inspiration for your work?

Cleage: When I set Blues in the middle of the Harlem Renaissance, I realized we always write about it as a period of wonderful creative energy … people were in an opportunistic moment making great work. But once the stock market crashed, a lot of that money dried up and lots of artists were in worse times—especially black artists. I was more interested in placing a story, I realized, in that time when a lot of that hope and artistry has dried up, and how different people reacted to it. Angel responds with absolute fear. Guy’s response is to pursue a moment beyond the present, and to become a citizen of the world.

Parson: I’ve always loved the whole environment of the Harlem Renaissance, the richness of it, and it’s always an honor working on your pieces, Pearl. When people walk into the theatre, I want older people to say, “That looks like my grandmother’s house!” Even before the play starts, they have the feeling of going back to that time. The timing is so right for some of the classic plays, because they’re more relevant now than ever.

Cleage: Yes, it’s interesting. We just did a 20th anniversary production [of Blues] at the Alliance Theatre, and I hadn’t seen the play for a long time. Beforehand, I thought, do I want to see this play again? Is it necessary to do it? Then I said to myself—wow! Intolerance, homophobia, anti-abortion … I could be writing this right now.

Parson: I was asked to do this during [the aftermath of] Ferguson, and I read it and said, this is today. I can do this and make this relevant to people who may think that this was just the past. We want artists to create artwork for the set that connects the show to the community. When they come, they see that there is a fire here that instills something new.

In Conversation with Playwright Pearl Cleage & Director Ron OJ Parson

Best-selling novels, plays, and poetry—Pearl Cleage has written it all. Her 1995 play Blues for an Alabama Sky thrusts audiences into the creative ferment of the Harlem Renaissance, just as the problems of the Great Depression begin to overshadow artistic triumphs and creep into characters’ lives. While set in the past, her work sends echoes to us in the present that are impossible to ignore. Court staff member Shelby Krick enjoyed a fascinating conversation with Cleage and Resident Artist and Director Ron OJ Parson.

In Blues for an Alabama Sky, you’re not writing about the Harlem Renaissance alone. You also focus on the Great Depression. How do you find that this time period intersects with the Great Depression, and why was that an inspiration for your work?

Cleage: When I set Blues in the middle of the Harlem Renaissance, I realized we always write about it as a period of wonderful creative energy … people were in an opportunistic moment making great work. But once the stock market crashed, a lot of that money dried up and lots of artists were in worse times—especially black artists. I was more interested in placing a story, I realized, in that time when a lot of that hope and artistry has dried up, and how different people reacted to it. Angel responds with absolute fear. Guy’s response is to pursue a moment beyond the present, and to become a citizen of the world.

Being a citizen of the world, having hope past that moment—I think these thoughts resonate with our audience given what’s happening in our country right now. Have things changed, or do we still have the same historical motives?

Cleage: Absolutely. Running through African American history and literature, there have always been two responses. One is that “we’re here, we belong here, and we’re not going to be run off.” The other is that “we don’t really belong here, and we don’t really like it here.” [The latter] becomes the impetus to leave, to go to West Africa or Paris and become a citizen of somewhere else. My father was a Black nationalist, and his attitude was always that we’re going to dig in right here. But I was always fascinated by Langston Hughes and the ex-patriots; what would happen if we left and tried something new? Doc and Delia represent people like my dad. They’re here in Harlem, they have gifts that could take them out of the realm of a poor struggling community. Their class and privilege doesn’t drive them to leave.

Parson: I’ve always loved the whole environment of the Harlem Renaissance, the richness of it, and it’s always an honor working on your pieces, Pearl. When people walk into the theatre, I want older people to say, “That looks like my grandmother’s house!” Even before the play starts, they have the feeling of going back to that time. The timing is so right for some of the classic plays, because they’re more relevant now than ever.

Cleage: Yes, it’s interesting. We just did a 20th anniversary production [of Blues] at the Alliance Theatre, and I hadn’t seen the play for a long time. Beforehand, I thought, do I want to see this play again? Is it necessary to do it? Then I said to myself—wow! Intolerance, homophobia, anti-abortion … I could be writing this right now.

Parson: I was asked to do this during [the aftermath of] Ferguson, and I read it and said, this is today. I can do this and make this relevant to people who may think that this was just the past. We want artists to create artwork for the set that connects the show to the community. When they come, they see that there is a fire here that instills something new.

Talk to us about your original ending, which will be produced here at Court. What does this change do for your story, and why include it now?

Cleage: When we first did [Blues] at the Alliance, we couldn’t keep my original ending, and so the new ending became the published one, lacking an extra character. The original ending was produced for the first time at the Alliance in the 20th anniversary production in 2015. The point of Angel is that she didn’t change, she didn’t learn the lesson, she isn’t redeemed. But I’ve seen so many productions where she is. That is not who this woman is. The original ending makes it much clearer and takes away the ambiguity.

Parson: I’m interested in her protracted struggle: that she’s going to make it work, make it happen, and she has her way to do that. She knows what she’s got to do to survive. When I was reading it I thought of Dutchman and how when she comes back, it’s the same cycle over again.
Cleage: It’s exactly that! I’ve been thinking even more now than when I first wrote it, people don’t change. They do what they do. We like to think that they would, but they don’t. Angel is always going to have that fear, that selfishness—she was always in it to do the best for her, to find a man who could protect her.

Parson: A good friend and mentor of mine, Steven Henderson, taught me that characters’ history before they get on stage and on the page is so important. It’s how they got to where they are before people see them, and that’s a whole world. I like to get into that with all of these characters because that depth is there for me: it’s in the art on the walls, on the carpet.

Bringing plays from the African American canon to life on Court Theatre’s stage is a crucial part of our mission. For you personally, why is it so important to keep producing these classic works?

Cleage: When young people think of this time, it’s so far removed and dusty. So I didn’t want to write biographical work that’s about real people. But somebody knew these real people and went to their parties. Part of the pleasure is having these characters move around in this world of real people, so you can recognize it or learn from it.

Parson: I’ve been working in Chicago for 20 years, so it’s good to have young, fresh actors. But it’s interesting to learn that in training programs, they do Shakespeare and other classics, but they don’t know the work of the Harlem Renaissance or the Civil Rights movement. As actors of color, we need to do this stuff.

Cleage: When I was 11, I saw A Raisin in the Sun. The auditorium was packed with an all black audience, all black community. When the show ended, there was a beat of absolute silence, then everyone stood up and clapped for 15 minutes! That was when I realized: poems are great, novels are good, but I want to be a playwright.

We’re in a time when art is certainly more important than ever. What inspires you to keep working and moving forward?

Cleage: I can’t imagine not writing. I’ve always felt that my writing is a vehicle to tell the truth, allow audiences to see life, and to be a part of the resistance. It couldn’t be more important now to write about compassion, put forth the truth, and question what is the longing.

This is not the first time we’ve had to deal with an adversarial relationship with the government; I remember when segregation was legal. We continue to move forward. We’ve always done theatre because we’re determined to. I never think about stopping; I always tell myself to sit down and write everything I know! We can find a moment when information from the past can be transmitted to the youth now. We must find them where they are, and meet them with the highest possible level of what we do.

Looking back on the Harlem Renaissance in 1940, the poet Langston Hughes, who never becomes more than a tantalizing offstage presence in Pearl Cleage’s Blues for an Alabama Sky, recalls the period as having been little more than a vain dream. Sure, it had been “a swell time while it lasted,” according to Hughes. But for those “Harlemites [who] thought the millennium had come” accompanied by “green pastures of tolerance created by” black poets, novelists, singers, bandleaders, and intellectuals, he had nothing but pity. “I don’t know what made any Negroes think that,” he writes, “except that they were mostly intellectuals doing the thinking. The ordinary Negroes hadn’t heard of the Negro Renaissance. And if they had, it hadn’t raised their wages any.”

The cultural movement of the 1920s known as the Harlem, Negro, or Black Renaissance was fueled by what is now known as the First Great Migration, when hundreds of thousands of black Americans from the southern states fled disfranchisement and the expansion of Jim Crow segregation in the South to seek the greater social freedom and the labor opportunities created in Northern cities by the World War I and new restrictions on European immigration. The migration was in many respects a rank-and-file movement of men and women seeking better lives. But Hughes was certainly right about the role of intellectual figures in shaping the cultural moment. The historian David Levering Lewis has argued that the Harlem Renaissance was largely the collective brainchild of such figures as W.E.B. Du Bois, Charles S. Johnson, Alain Locke, A. Phillip Randolph, and Jessie Fauset who believed that the careful cultivation of literature and the arts could play a significant role in managing relations between blacks and other racial groups in urban centers. Black creativity and genius would elicit respect for the race generally, reducing prejudice and tension between blacks and whites. For various reasons, this belief was indeed a pipedream, and when the 1929 Stock Market crash precipitated the Great Depression, the idea that artistic innovation would bring with it economic prosperity and civic equality was largely tattered. By 1940 Hughes’s sober estimate of the period seemed warranted.

Nonetheless, the cultural landscape of the nation had been forever altered. What underwrote the idea of the Harlem Renaissance was the pluralist belief that every racial group was responsible for working out its own distinctive form and style of cultural expression. The path to becoming truly American ran not through embracing a generic Americanness but through some form of racial, ethnic or perhaps even regional particularity. The 1920s not only gave us the major writers and artists of the Harlem Renaissance (which, along with Hughes, include such figures as Zora Neale Hurston, Countee Cullen, Jessie Fauset, Nella Larsen, and Jean Toomer), but also the major writers of American modernism—Ernest Hemingway, F. Scott Fitzgerald, Willa Cather, William Carlos Williams, and William Faulkner—who are all preoccupied in one way or another with figuring out who “we” are and how “we” should go about expressing ourselves. Our America, as the literary historian Walter Benn Michaels has argued, is one where we have been enjoined to embrace and celebrate cultural difference. In the words of Cleage’s Guy Jacobs, who dreams of designing costumes for dancer Josephine Baker, “Harlem was supposed to be a place where Negroes could come together and really walk about”—a place of mutual black expression that would be appropriately echoed in other ethnic enclaves across the nation.

Undercutting the vision of collective black political power, as represented by another offstage presence in Blues—the Reverend Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., who succeeded his father as pastor of the prominent Abyssinian Baptist Church and would go on in 1945 to become the first African American New Yorker to be elected to the House of Representatives—was the fact that black Americans were never an homogeneous group. Delia’s belief that birth control and the right to abortion were key to the liberation of black women was indeed endorsed by the Abyssinian Baptist Church and influential individuals like Du Bois, and echoed in some Harlem Renaissance fiction, like Angelina Weld Grimke’s short story “The Closing Door” and Nella Larsen’s novel Quicksand, in which the refusal to bring black male children into the world was offered up as a protest against lynching. Even so, the opening of the first birth control clinic in Harlem by Margaret Sanger’s American Birth Control League was hardly an occasion of universal approbation, with some blacks fearing the League’s aims were too closely aligned with the eugenicists.

But for writers, performers, artists, particularly those whose sexualities did not adhere to prescribed social norms, 1920s Harlem was, if only for “a hot minute” a place where it seemed possible to construct what Langston Hughes called, “temples for tomorrow.” And if the moment of the Harlem Renaissance left us with some ideas we might be better off without, it also produced some of the most intriguing art and literature of the 20th century.

1 Langston Hughes, The Big Sea (New York: Hill and Wang, 1940), p. 228.
“That’s one of the secrets of life...
Don’t forget it. Learn to spot the romance.”

These lines, spoken by the character Guy in Blues for an Alabama Sky, resonate loud and clear. So many times, as playwright Pearl Cleage suggests, we miss the love and beauty that surround us. The richness of the Harlem Renaissance’s culture changed America forever. Cleage’s play fully reveals to us how romance and a love for beauty infused the music, the poetry and the art of that time.

It is always an honor working on a Pearl Cleage play, but for me it is an honor to work on Blues in particular. The Harlem Renaissance is an open canvas, a singularly vibrant landscape for a gifted writer and historian such as Cleage to explore. Her plays brings to life the magic of one of the most artistically fertile periods in American history. So many of the towering artists we revere today are those who found their voice and thrived during the Harlem Renaissance.

Blues may be set in 1930, but many of the issues in the play remain strongly relevant today. It is disheartening to realize just how relevant those issues are now. Our protracted struggle continues. Through it all, we must strive to spot the romance, and find the strength both to continue to dream and to achieve our dreams. Hopefully, love will pull us through. It has to. In the words of Langston Hughes’ Dreams,

Hold fast to dreams
For if dreams die
Life is a broken-winged bird
That cannot fly.

Hold fast to dreams
For when dreams go
Life is a barren field
Frozen with snow.

Chip Bamberger and Martha Van Haitsma

Chip Bamberger and Martha Van Haitsma, Producers’ Circle members and long-time subscribers, are firm believers in the transformative power of the arts in education.

In addition to their three decades as loyal subscribers, Chip and Martha are generous patrons of Court. Their most recent gift will fund an innovative collaboration between Court and the Ancona School in Hyde Park/Kenwood. Court staff, in conjunction with faculty and staff at Ancona, have developed a new program that will immerse students in the artistic and theatrical process surrounding Court’s production of Blues for an Alabama Sky. At the same time, the Ancona faculty are focusing their coursework throughout the academic year on the history, art and music of the Harlem Renaissance.

Chip and Martha’s interest in funding this unique program was spurred by a memorable experience one of Court’s First Rehearsals, where cast members gather to read a script through together for the first time. “We attended a reading of Skylight in 2012 with one of our sons, and were impressed at how actors at a table reading could make the story and characters come alive instantly,” recalls Martha. “We’d seen plays at Court for decades, but witnessing a First Rehearsal deepened our appreciation for the work and process behind the scenes.” As a Board member at the Ancona School, Chip thought that attendance at a First Rehearsal would be an unforgettable opportunity for students, affording them the same rare insight into a dramatic work in the process of creation. Their youngest son, an Ancona alumnus, enthusiastically supported the idea.

As discerning theatre goers, Chip and Martha rank Court among the top-performing theatres that consistently produce work of the highest quality. “The acting is top-notch, and the intimate setting of the theatre provides a visceral view of the action on stage,” says Martha. Chip especially appreciates the wide range of genres that Court produces—dramas, comedies, musicals—and he fondly recalls Travesties and Scapin as highlights, while Martha lists Caroline, or Change and The Invention of Love among her favorites. Productions they both found particularly moving include Angels in America, Man of La Mancha, and the plays of August Wilson’s Century Cycle. As members of the Producers’ Circle, Court’s premier giving society, the couple has also enjoyed attending special events featuring Court artists and University of Chicago scholars. “Being able to further understand the background of plays, and hear the insights of playwrights and translators, certainly enriches our theatre-going experience,” reflects Martha.

Chip and Martha are excited for Court’s upcoming collaboration with the Ancona School. “Court’s receptiveness towards the idea, combined with the energy and enthusiasm of educators at Ancona, will create an exceptional experience for the students,” says the couple. Court Theatre thanks Chip and Martha for their continued support, and applauds their exemplary commitment to the arts and education.

Partnerships: The Ancona School

Thanks to the generous support of Chip Bamberger and Martha Van Haitsma, students at Hyde Park’s Ancona School gained a special, behind-the-scenes experience with the artists, actors, and designers at work on Court’s production of Blues for an Alabama Sky.

Throughout their entire academic year, the Ancona School’s seventh and eighth graders are dedicated to exploring the Harlem Renaissance. The school’s faculty have incorporated the Harlem Renaissance as a unifying theme across the curriculums of language arts, social studies, and visual arts. For several months, Ancona students have been learning about the art, the history, and the extraordinary impact of the period.

The students’ work in school was combined with an in-depth look at the way Court’s production team brought Blues for an Alabama Sky to life on stage. They also used Pearl Cleage’s script to learn about everyday life during the Harlem Renaissance through a theatrical text. In November, before the rehearsal process began, director Ron OJ Parson went to Ancona to talk with seventh and eighth grade students about the play, the artistic process, and his role as director. The students then attended Court’s First Rehearsal of Blues for an Alabama Sky, during which they heard from the designers about the set, costumes, lighting, and sound, and listened to the actors read through the script for the very first time. Several weeks later, the students attended the first technical rehearsal of the production, observing the technical team in action as the actors’ work and the designs were brought together. Finally, they experienced the complete performance at a student matinee.

Through this program, the students are able to experience and understand the full arc of the artistic production process. They are learning not only the way live theatre is made, but also gaining a richer sense of a unique historical period. In addition to studying the Harlem Renaissance, students are asking how the artists of the 1920s and 30s worked together to create social change. They have composed biographies of period figures, investigated primary sources, and analyzed the literature and visual art of the times. By watching experts at work during the artistic process for Blues for an Alabama Sky, students are learning about collaboration and creative problem-solving in a real-world setting. In the spring, these scholars will participate in their own theatrical event, “Blues for an Ancona Sky,” a Harlem Renaissance-themed cabaret including performances by the seventh and eighth grade Advanced Band and Performing Arts students.

Court Theatre is very grateful for the enthusiastic participation of the teachers and administrators at the Ancona School, and for the generosity of Chip and Martha, who made this experience possible.
