WELCOME

Dear Friends,

Welcome to the world premiere of Berlin. We are proud to present this new adaptation from Mickie Maher, based on Jason Lutes's iconic graphic novel of the same name, and directed by Charles Newell. Charlie and Mickie last collaborated on 2004's Cyrano; now—over twenty years later—Berlin represents an exciting new chapter in their creative history.

Berlin, the city, was a symbol of progress and energy in 1928. It was abuzz with new ways of thinking, of being, and of seeing. It was a home for expats, immigrants, artists, creatives, and philosophers, and was the nexus of a rapidly expanding world.

That sense of progress, energy, and expansion is the beating heart of Berlin, the play. Adaptation is hard work. It is also an opportunity to do something akin to alchemy. Challenging and rare, a great adaptation takes what is poignant in one medium and spins it into gold in another.

For 70 seasons, Court Theatre has been an adaptor of great texts and a champion of quintessential stories. We will continue this alchemy of making classic texts new again, and we will not acquiesce by only telling stories that are easy or familiar. It is vitally important that we stay hungry, stay ambitious, and remain steadfast in our mission: to reimagine classic theatre to illuminate our current times, even when we'd rather look away.

We know we are not alone in this belief. By attending a world premiere—by attending live theatre, even—you are supporting this mission. The University of Chicago supports this mission by featuring the adaptation and staging of Berlin in its coursework, giving students an up-close look at the creative process and inspiring the next generation of artists. Chicago Public Schools and other educational institutions support this mission by bringing young people to our student matinees, reinforcing the value of arts education. And our partners support this mission through our public programming, through which they connect the themes onstage to our lived realities and demonstrate the modern relevance of this art form.

That same energy inherent in Berlin, the city, and Berlin, the play, is inherent in who we are and what we do. This production is part of a much larger legacy—the legacy of theatre and democracy. Both must be preserved.

Thank you for standing alongside us.

IN CONVERSATION

CHARLES NEWELL AND MICKLE MAHER

Photograph of first rehearsal of Berlin (Joe Mazza).

Charles Newell and Mickle Maher have never experienced anything quite like Berlin, and they've been in this industry for decades.

Associate Director of Marketing Camille Oswald sat down with the director and adaptor of Jason Lutes's acclaimed graphic novel to discuss their collaborative history and the excitement, challenges, and opportunities inherent in adapting a graphic novel for the stage. Read on to learn more and join us on the tightrope.

What has the creative process been like so far?

Mickle: This creative process thus far is probably the longest creative process I've ever been a part of for a single project—four or five years now? Have you ever been involved in something this long?

Charlie: I've worked on projects over longer periods, but the quality of the transformation in our journey has been more than anything I've ever experienced: what we thought it was going to be, what it is now becoming, and what it might be once we open. We were so fortunate to have a playwright who would want to keep iterating, to create something transformationally different than what it was.

Mickle: It took so long to get it to anything resembling something that we would want to do! Adapting graphic novels isn't done very often, and this is a really long graphic novel [laughs]. This is an epic thing. The challenge of this graphic novel is its length; it took Jason 20 years to write, it's over 500 pages long, and it has dozens of major and minor characters. It requires some amount of distillation. I don't know why there aren't more stage adaptations of graphic novels, because they're adapted for film all the time: Marvel, Scott Pilgrim, Ghost World. There's a whole catalog of stories [that have been] visually imagined already, so I don't know why they haven't been [adapted for] the stage, but they haven't. There's Fun Home, of course, but other than that, I do feel like we're pioneers in that respect.

Charlie: There's a theme throughout the entire novel about perspective, and depth, and layering, so the design was deeply informed by this idea of, How do you take what a graphic novel is uniquely capable of doing, and translate that into something specific to the theatre? And that, to me, is thrilling. I am a restless spirit who doesn't like doing what I've already done. I am mostly driven by, How do I get in the room with amazingly creative people and do something that I—and they—have never done together?

Mickle: Every other play that I've ever written, I could envision how it would be staged. This is the exception to that rule. We are in uncharted territory here—there's a feeling of risk and of being on the tightrope. You really could see a million different ways in which it could be staged, a million different aesthetic choices before you, in a way that's just not true of other plays that I've worked on, and I would say, not true of 90% of theatre out there. It's not clear exactly how to stage this, which actually—much to my surprise and delight—the designers seemed excited by.

Charlie: The metaphor of a river is consistent throughout Lutes's text; the presence, identity, and energy of trains coming and going constantly, and people crossing complicated landscapes (both literal and metaphoric, emotional landscapes), so— and this is probably no surprise to folks who know Court's work—there is a goal that we never stop moving. We don't settle anywhere because the text doesn't.

Mickle: Berlin at the end of the Weimar period is this almost Oz-like, magical place, where we just imagine the greatest artists and musicians, theatre directors, film directors converging for all sorts of complicated historical reasons in one place. Imagining how exciting that was, and how dynamic and how electric, and how complicated and all that, has turned the Berlin of that time—in our collective, cultural mind—into a romanticized place of incredible energy; an almost magical-beyond-belief energy right before the worst of the worst thing happens.

The last time that you both collaborated was in 2004 on Cyrano, almost exactly 20 years ago. What is it like to work together again?

Charlie: There's 20 years of experience between us, and now we have a wisdom of process that I certainly didn't have back then. The idea that we could now take on something this ambitious is terrifying and wonderful. That's a good place to be.

Mickle: I get excited by seeing actors, and designers, and directors take on difficult things. So whether or not any given production succeeds, there is this other drama going on, just seeing twelve of the best actors in Chicago go up there, and do, and be stretched to their limits in a way that is quite obvious. You'll see them in the first five minutes, you'll be like, Oh my god, they're doing something that I've never seen actors quite do before. It's that excitement of seeing some of the best artists in town be challenged to their fullest extent.

Charlie: The ambition behind this production is unlike any I have ever experienced. Imagine what it would be like to be an actor in something like this! I'm so optimistic about what the experience will be like for an audience sitting in Court Theatre's intimate space, and I imagine that, for an audience member, the energy onstage will be unlike anything you've seen before. The best theatre experience is when you get completely pulled in, and you're not looking at a product that has been shaped and crafted for you to easily digest; rather, you're seeing spontaneity being made up in every single moment, and you can't take your eyes away.

Mickle: We've been working at this game for a long time; trust us when we say, this is different than anything else we've ever done.

Charlie: Join us on the tightrope. [laughs]

CONJURING BERLIN

BY DAVID J. LEVIN, PRODUCTION DRAMATURG AND ALICE H. AND STANLEY G. HARRIS JR. DISTINGUISHED SERVICE PROFESSOR OF GERMANIC STUDIES, CINEMA AND MEDIA STUDIES, THEATER AND PERFORMANCE STUDIES, AND THE COLLEGE AT THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

Costume party at the Institute for the Study of Sexuality in Berlin, date/photographer unknown. Magnus Hirschfeld (in glasses) with his partner, Karl Giese (center).

How best to grasp the project of Berlin? Why not start with Shakespeare's Henry V? For if ever there was a piece that took upon itself the charge of impossible invention, challenging its actors and inviting its audience to co-create a world, it is Henry V. There are elaborate battles across the sea involving impossibly complex constellations of troops—in short, the story exceeds theatre's immediate means. And that, in turn, occasions the chorus's exhortation to the audience, in the Prologue, to

*Piece out our imperfections with your thoughts.
Into a thousand parts divide one man,
And make imaginary puissance.
Think, when we talk of horses, that you see them
Printing their proud hoofs i' th' receiving earth,
For 'tis your thoughts that now must deck our kings,
Carry them here and there, jumping o'er times,
Turning th' accomplishment of many years
Into an hourglass.*

The project of Berlin is no less ambitious; its opportunities for invention and imagination no less exciting.

If Shakespeare's history plays famously focus upon the trials and tribulations of life at various royal courts, Lutes's graphic novel and Maher's play focus on the trials and tribulations of life in the modern metropolis. Thus, in place of the earls and dukes and courtiers, we have the extraordinary cross-section of characters that make up the budding and buzzing capital of Germany during the final years of the Weimar Republic, between 1928 (about a decade after the end of World War I) and the rise of Adolf Hitler and the National Socialists in 1933.

Berlin in the 1920s was one of the most important urban centers in Europe, on par with London and Paris. And the challenge that Shakespeare points to—the challenge of creating a giant and far-away world on a small stage—that's a challenge that our production embraces with relish. We get a sense of the extraordinary effervescence of invention in this city—in the visual arts, in jazz, in journalism (there were some 4,700 newspapers published in Germany during the period of our piece, with about 200 in the city of Berlin alone; that's Kurt Severing's world, but also David Schwartz's when he sells copies of the AIZ, the Arbeiter-Illustrierte-Zeitung or the Workers Illustrated Newspaper, in the rain), in politics (there were 40 different political parties represented in the German parliament—which accounts for Hitler and Goebbels coming to town, since the Nazis were a party on the rise), in sexuality and individual expression (in 1919, the early sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld opened the Institut für Sexualwissenschaft, the Institute for the Study of Sexuality, in Berlin, and it soon gained international renown as a center advocating for greater understanding of and legal protections for homosexuality and LGBTQ rights. The Nazis occupied and vandalized the Institute as soon as they came to power, burning almost the entirety of its considerable library in the book burnings in Berlin in May of 1933). It was a place and a time of intense invention and intense reaction. It was a time of intense inflation and intense unemployment. And in the midst of it all, the city grew and grew, doubling in population every 25 years or so, beginning in 1820, when it was a city of 200,000, to 1905 when its population was two million. By 1925 it had doubled again to four million. As the capital of a recently united Germany, the intense struggle for political power in the wake of the Great Depression of 1929 was waged in parliament and on the streets. This is the story we will tell—a story of urbanity, invention, innovation, rapid change, bustle, overcrowding, ambition, dissent, growing political violence and disorder, disorientation, artistic ferment, love and intimacy, violence and despair.

Crucially, this is less the story of kings and rulers (although we have one of them) than a story of a cross-section of extraordinary ordinary people. And in the midst of it all, we will extend a familiar invitation to you, Court's audience, to join us, by lending us your imagination, by, as Shakespeare puts it, dividing one actor "into a thousand parts." What an exciting journey it will be, to a world that is at once very different and far away and, alas, not so different or far away from ours in Chicago, in the USA, in this moment. Welcome to Berlin!

NO MORE PRECIOUS STONES

BY ALICE GOFF, ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF GERMAN HISTORY AND THE COLLEGE AT THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

Illustration from the graphic novel Berlin by Jason Lutes.

The Weimar Republic often appears in the popular imagination as a cultural object. It is the snapshots of urban decadence in Christopher Isherwood's 1939 novel, Goodbye to Berlin; it is the brassy tunes of Bob Fosse's 1972 musical based on that novel, Cabaret. It is the feverish choreography of the hit television series Babylon Berlin. It is the cacophonous ink drawings of Jason Lutes's graphic novel, Berlin, the dynamic adaptation by Mickle Maher, and the kinetic stagecraft of Charles Newell. We come away from these works with a vibrant aesthetic language to describe this complex time and place in history: Weimar is a kaleidoscope, a collage, a variety show, a dance on the edge of a volcano.

That Weimar lives on as a style, a sound, a beat is of course due to the extraordinary cultural energy of its capital city during the period. Berlin was a hub for jazz music, variety shows, cabaret, and opera. As Kid Hogan observes in the play, "There's not a note of music in this city that's not pushing against every note that came before." It was also a city of "cinema, cinema über alles," in the words of expressionist poet Hans Harbeck, home to the country's largest film production company, UFA, which brought icons of avant-garde cinema to national and international audiences, such as The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari and Metropolis. In the field of the visual arts, Berlin was a seat of the Dada movement; the founding place of the expressionist November Group; an epicenter of the New Objectivity movement. As the city grew, it became a platform for bold experiments in architectural innovation, particularly in the field of public housing: the sprawling expressionist estates designed by Bruno Taut, Walter Gropius, Martin Wagner, and Hans Scharoun still assert themselves in the city's urban landscape. The characterization of Berlin as "Chicago on the Spree," once meant as an insult, became during the 1920s a badge of the city's exhilarating modernism.

One of the challenges of understanding the history of Weimar has been reconciling its avant-garde cultural foment with the rise of National Socialism. The era of Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weil, of the Bauhaus and Dada was also an era of extreme reactionary conservatism and fascism. Some historians have addressed this problem by reminding us that even if Berlin has become the iconic symbol of Weimar, the city is hardly representative of the political or cultural realities of the rest of Germany after the devastation of the First World War. Others have pointed out the ways in which both National Socialism and Weimar's artistic renaissance were both products of a reigning spirit of experimentation oriented towards the discovery of radical new ways of conceiving individual and collective life. Others have posited that the energy of Weimar culture drew in many ways from its position outside of the mainstream. The true home of Weimar's spirit, the historian Peter Gay writes, was, tragically, in exile.

Berlin confronts this period of simultaneous creativity and crisis by bringing us eye to eye with its consequences on the ground. Amidst the maelstrom of sound and image unfolding on the stage, we encounter the deep uncertainty of the story's central characters about whether their writing, drawing, musicking can meet, or even contain, the catastrophes quickly unfolding in Weimar's final years. Perhaps, as the character Kurt Severing proclaims early in the piece, "In Berlin, fine art and revolutionary politics are joined at the hip." The character Anna is not so sure: "Maybe art is only calling us to art," she confides to Marthe. "Art can say nothing matter of fact about reality." Marthe embraces drawing, but for its ordinariness, rather than for its world-changing potential. By capturing this complex convergence of aesthetic exuberance and aesthetic doubt, Berlin delivers us a powerful rendering of Weimar as a work of theatre, informed by the period's anxiety about the relationship between culture and life. In the words of the playwright Friedrich Wolf, writing in 1929: "We do not want any artworks, even if they are precious stones. We want the truth of our time."

ALICE GOFF is Assistant Professor of German History and the College. Her research and writing focus on cultural and intellectual life in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. She is the author of The God Behind the Marble: The Fate of Art in the German Aesthetic State (University of Chicago Press, 2024). Goff received her PhD in history from the University of California, Berkeley, in 2015. From 2015 to 2017, she was a postdoctoral fellow in the University of Michigan's Society of Fellows in the departments of History and Germanic Languages and Literatures. Before beginning graduate work in history, Goff completed a master's degree in archives and records management and a certificate in museum studies, and she maintains an active interest in contemporary archival and curatorial practice.

CONTINUING THE CONVERSATION

BY GABRIELLE RANDLE-BENT,
SENIOR ARTISTIC PRODUCER

Born in the same time and place and born of the same values of freedom of expression and communion, theatre and democracy are inextricably linked. Globally, we are living in a moment in which democracy is at risk. So, by extension, any attack on democracy is an attack on the very art form we hold dear.

Fortunately, artists have a history of fighting back. The artists of Weimar Germany are a critical part of that history.

Bertolt Brecht wrote The Threepenny Opera in 1928 as a critique of capitalism. Banned by the Nazi party in 1933, this play was one of the first to be performed in post-World War II Berlin in 1945. Brecht wrote Mother Courage and Her Children in 1939, this time in response to fascism and Nazism, creating an anti-war play that is regarded as one of the most important theatrical works of the twentieth century. Brecht's The Resistible Rise of Arturo Ui and St. Joan of the Stockyards uses Chicago and our reputation as both a site of legitimate industry and organized crime as an allegory for the corrupting influence of power.

The Bauhaus school of art and design is another example of artists using their genius to fight for that most incomparable of human achievements, the sublime. The Bauhaus movement encouraged radical modernity, minimalism, and functionality. Artist Wassily Kandinsky and architect Ludwig Mies van der Rohe were both influenced by—and influential in—this movement, and van der Rohe served as Bauhaus's final director before it was shuttered by the Nazi party for directly challenging "traditional German values." Despite its closure, Bauhaus could not be contained; it continued to spread around the world due to global immigration and displacement. Van der Rohe came to Chicago in 1938 after fleeing Germany, and our city now has more van der Rohe buildings than any other city in the world. His indefatigable spirit is responsible for our iconic skyline.

Bertolt Brecht and Mies Van der Rohe are two examples from a particular time in history, but there are countless artists who have found ways to use their art to bring change in the world.

We did not plan to stage Berlin in response to our current moment, but here we are. It is time we draw inspiration from the artists who came before and rise to the challenge.

A CONVERSATION WITH PUBLIC MEDIA INSTITUTE

BY KAMILAH RASHIED, DIRECTOR OF ENGAGEMENT

Image from “The Concord Hour,” directed by Damon Locks and Rob Shaw.

Though I have been an enthusiastic fan of the Public Media Institute (PMI) and all its manifestations for some time, I did not meet its Managing Director Nick Wylie until 2024 at an event at Co-Prosperity, a cultural space that’s part of the PMI network. We were introduced by a mutual friend who was stunned we didn’t already know each other. In millennial fashion, we Insta-searched one another only to find we were already following one another.

When considering the public programming that would complement Berlin—Court’s world-premiere adaptation of Jason Lutes’s graphic novel—PMI immediately came to mind. Berlin is a mosaic of interconnecting stories told in 1928, a time of ascendant fascism. We see characters support one another, form networks of mutual aid and support, and challenge hegemonic and harmful systems through the power of collective action. PMI is grounded in those same values. For this reason (and for many others), I was inspired to collaborate with them on part of our Berlin public programs series, centering themes of Resistance & Resilience.

Having admired their work from a distance, I finally got the chance to speak with Nick and PMI’s Founding Director Ed Marszewski about the inner workings of this dynamic organization—or should I say, this living, breathing, and evolving organism. Below is an excerpt from our conversation.

How did the Public Media Institute come into being?

Ed Marszewski: The Public Media Institute (PMI) was born out of the same ethos that fueled Lumpen Magazine: a belief in creating independent cultural platforms outside the grip of mainstream media and corporate influence. By the early 2000s, after years of publishing Lumpen, organizing festivals, and experimenting with alternative media, it became clear that a more structured, sustainable model was needed to support these efforts. PMI was founded as a nonprofit to ensure that the work—building spaces for radical art, resistance, and community media—could continue and expand.

It’s a continuation of the DIY (or rather, DIT—Do-It-Together) philosophy that has always driven us: make the media you want to see, create the spaces you need, and build the networks that keep you and your people going.

Can you tell us more about the Buddy System network—a collection of community-driven projects, of which the Public Media Institute is a part—and its ethos?

Nick Wylie: The Buddy System is a collaborative network based in Chicago, encompassing a diverse array of businesses, nonprofits, publications, and creative individuals. This ecosystem is dedicated to fostering a community-driven future through mutual support, platform building, and innovative ventures.

During the COVID-19 pandemic, the Buddy System’s ethos of mutual aid and solidarity became particularly evident. PMI partnered with for-profit members and restaurants led by BIPOC chefs to establish the Community Kitchen. This initiative coordinated and facilitated the reopening of shuttered kitchens, employed dozens of hospitality industry workers, and successfully prepared and distributed over 200,000 free healthy chef-designed meals, addressing food insecurity and demonstrating the power of collective action in times of crisis.

Bridgeport’s transformation from a historically exclusionary area to one of Chicago’s most diverse neighborhoods also aligns with the Buddy System’s mission. Once known for its racial intolerance, Bridgeport has evolved into a majority-minority community, with 63% of residents identifying as Latinx or Asian. This demographic shift has paved the way for businesses within the Buddy System to create inclusive “third spaces”—venues beyond home and work—in Bridgeport that cater to the community’s rich diversity.

By building a supportive network that embraces risks and celebrates diverse perspectives, the Buddy System seeks to carve out spaces of resistance and innovation within the constraints of contemporary society and capitalism.

PMI has so many manifestations. Why is that so important?

Ed Marszewski: It is important to pivot, evolve, or change priorities when the political and cultural environment in our city has a deficiency. It is also important to retire projects that are not supported by the communities they seek to serve. Over the years, PMI has developed a multifaceted approach to cultural programming, encompassing various platforms and initiatives. There is Lumpen Magazine, PMI’s longest-running project, which is a news and culture magazine featuring the work of emerging and established artists and writers for over three decades. PMI operates Co-Prosperity, a 5,000+ square foot experimental cultural center and performance space in Bridgeport, showcasing emerging and established artists from Chicago and around the world. In 2015, PMI founded Lumpen Radio, a low-power community radio station broadcasting 24/7 multilingual content, serving local communities in Chicago’s Near South Side. We also coordinate Buddy, a retail shop in the Chicago Cultural Center that promotes products by Chicago-based artists, makers, and small businesses.

Finally, through the MdW Coalition—an evolving regional coalition of artist-run projects, platforms, and spaces spanning across the Midwest—PMI works with like-minded individuals and organizations to uncover and archive the region’s cultural and social ecologies.

PMI’s diverse manifestations are driven by a commitment to adapt and respond to community needs. This adaptability has led to significant achievements, such as supporting 500 artists in selling their work, enabling over 100 Chicagoans to host radio shows, hosting more than a dozen exhibitions annually featuring over 100 artists each, and collaborating on over 25 movement events each year.

Each entity within the PMI ecosystem relies on a great deal of collaboration and co-creation. How do you do it?

Nick Wylie: Collaboration at Public Media Institute isn’t just a strategy—it’s our entire way of working, evolving, and staying resilient.

Volunteers sustain Lumpen Radio, but so does the core team of Stephanie Manriquez, Charly Garcia, Ariandy Luna, and August Abitang, who uplift dozens of DJs and show hosts while creating their own vital programming, like The Mutual Aid Guide with Mario Smith and Boletín Migrante, which provides urgent updates for immigrant communities at risk of deportation. These shows are the result of long-standing relationships of trust and care.

At Co-Prosperity, our 29-person artist council is an organism of enthusiasm, nerdiness, and passion, stewarded by Ahniya Butler and SY Lim, who work closely with each selected artist and curator. Every exhibition is a collaboration, with council members jumping in as “buddies” to support planning, mounting, and celebrating each show. Meanwhile, the Buddy Shop team—led by Kimberly Kim, Sara Pardo, Seiya Abe-Bell, and Janelle Ayana Miller—does far more than keep the store running seven days a week. They work closely with artist collectives to develop new products, ensuring that the shop is not just a marketplace but a launchpad for artist-run initiatives.

I’ve come to realize that while PMI operates as an organization, at certain moments—especially in times of urgent action, like at the Democratic National Convention last year—we transform into something else. We become a collective of artists making something bigger than the sum of our parts.

Coalition-making seems inherently built into everything you do. Did that evolve naturally, or was this an explicit value from the beginning around which you developed a broader value system?

Nick Wylie: It evolved from necessity, from instinct, from the reality that if you want to make something happen, you need other people in the mix.

We can’t be the central hub for every response to collapse, but we can be a place that gets the word out about what’s possible. We can signal who is organizing, where to show up, what to eat, drink, read, listen to, and what performances are actually the good kind of political theatre. Sometimes, we even pull that off. And when we don’t, when we look dopey or messy while trying, we can say it’s camouflage—or just admit that we’re not here to crack some master code of cultural hegemony. We’re here to help artists and weirdos scatter a million needles in every direction at the giant [of capitalism] coming to step on us. Maybe one will hit the right nerve, or maybe the collective effect will be enough to slow it down. Either way, we keep moving, keep organizing, and keep figuring out how to do this together.

From the outside, it seems that keeping up the momentum behind this work takes a tremendous amount of effort. What does it feel like to you from the inside?

Nick Wylie: It feels like I’m writing these answers at 3:25am because I don’t want to disappoint our comrades at Court. Some of us care about making things perfect, sometimes we are relieved when a meeting is postponed; usually, we rely on the artists, and DJs, and journalists, and activists we are working with to have patience with us, and recognize the autonomy we want to—and have to—share with them to make this possible. Since last year, we have been sharing our space with the Dissenters, who organize there on Sundays, and we welcome them to share the space with other movement groups, so long as there is a Dissenter member there to monitor the space and help the group. We hope that, with more mutual support methods like this, we can keep sharing the load, and focus on keeping the platforms healthy and available.

What are the best ways for people to support the Public Media Institute and all its tributaries?

Nick Wylie: We have zero major donors. If you know anyone in the position to be a sustaining major gift supporter, you will have done something no one in 35 years has been able to do. Or you can become a member at any level and join the hundreds of people who make this thing work without any gigantic individual donors.

Or you can come to our (all free) events and buy a beer, and talk to an artist, or spread the word about Lumpen Radio (ideally to someone whose local business would like to underwrite). Or you can pitch an exhibition, or a radio show, or submit your book, or record, or poster, or hat, or lamp that you made to show and sell at the Buddy Store.

Or you can just say nice things about us!

UP NEXT: AN ILIAD

“A MASTERPIECE”

- CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Photograph of Timothy Edward Kane (Michael Brosilow).

Join us for a special presentation of An Iliad. Berlin Director Charles Newell returns to Court’s stage to present one of the most celebrated productions in our history.

“This text is perhaps one of the clearest examples of classics’ modern relevance, and it has been an artistic touchstone of mine for many years,” Newell shares. “I know our audience feels the same; we have received countless calls, emails, and questions asking when we will be staging An Iliad again, and it brings me great joy to say: the wait is over.”

A timely and gripping retelling of Homer’s epic poem, An Iliad illuminates the human cost of conflict with breathtaking urgency. Timothy Edward Kane reprises his role as The Poet—the sole character in this one-person saga—who recounts a tale of war, hubris, and destruction that spirals across millennia and crashes into our present day. Experience the raw power of Kane’s performance in Court Theatre’s intimate Abelson Auditorium, and confront the necessity of the classics head-on.

An Iliad returns to Court’s stage June 11 – 29, 2025. Get tickets and learn more here, or call the Box Office at (773) 753-4472.

ABOUT COURT THEATRE

Winner of the 2022 Regional Theatre Tony Award, Court Theatre reimagines classic theatre to illuminate our current times. In residence at the University of Chicago and on Chicago’s historic South Side, we engage our audiences with intimate and provocative experiences that inspire deeper exploration of the enduring questions that confront humanity and connect us as people.

Court Theatre defines classic theatre as texts from any culture, tradition, or era that resonate throughout time and speak to our present moment.
